Keeping Austin Weird

This summer my grandson said we had to visit Austin's "graffiti wall" so off we go with a couple of cans of spray paint. I had not heard of it and soon found out it is a three-story artist playground with a castle on the top of the hill. There are walls full of amazing murals and a whole lot of messy art work but it is full of energy - a perfect example of keeping Austin weird. After climbing up a very steep path to see a splendid view, I ever so carefully checked for wet paint before sitting down to watch all the aspiring artists. The are local artists there who sell their goods and one told me that a developer had planned to build condos but the slab cracked so he opened it up to artists who do murals and it was officially named HOPE (Helping Other People Everywhere). Since then, they are letting visitors do their own art work and it is also known as the Graffiti Wall at Castle Hill. Whatever the story is, it is worth checking it out at Baylor and 11th St. in weird Austin, TX (picture on left is Sherri at HOPE)

What Did that Sign Say?

FOR ANYONE WHO HAS CHILDREN AND DOESN'T KNOW IT, THERE IS A DAY CARE ON THE 1ST FLOOR.

Seaholm Intake Facility; a Project to watch. The Seaholm Intake Facility is located on the banks of Lady Bird Lake and the Ann and Roy Butler Hike-and-Bike Trail. Originally it was a crucial part of the former Seaholm Power Plant. It was used to draw water from the lake and funnel it under Cesar Chavez Street to the power plant until it was shut down in 1989. As I understand, the City of Austin is taking it on as its newest revitalization of an old and very interesting building. Wells Dunbar called the facility "One of the most beautiful building you've never noticed". An iconic art Deco design known as "Art Modern" from 1950, the building itself is best seen from Lady Bird Lake. The city hopes to extend the trail over water and the trail will serve as the "intersection" between downtown, the Seaholm district and the new Central Library. The Trail Foundation, will raise money to move the trail, remove invasive plants and bring in natives. Excerpts from Austin Statesman article 9/25/2013
